Q: How to expose a WCF service from ASP.NET MVC I'm new to wcf and I'd like to use a wcf service in my MVC application to do CRUD operations on a database. These WCF services will be consumed by an external application (there is no request I'd like to make to the service). I assume we need a http endpoint somewhere. Where should we put it? Should it be the main site? (where all my controllers are hosted and called) Should it be a different subdomain? (again, same controllers, but now a different url) Should I leave it as is? How to expose a wcf service via asp.net mvc? I'm pretty sure I do know the answer but I'd like some pointers as to where to look and what I need to search for. Thanks! A: OK, here is a few pointers on how to use WCF from ASP.NET MVC (partly copied from some code I once wrote):

How to: Use WCF from ASP.NET MVC

Introducing WCF services How do you consume WCF services using .NET?

Regarding the above: WCF Services are accessible via HTTP(s) WCF Services are Odata enabled (provides structured data in JSON and XML format) WCF Services are meant for distributed scenarios where you want to offload a task/work load to another server. WCF services are accessible via an HTTP endpoint You need to have a configuration setup in your WCF services to define all the contracts that you want to expose and authenticate at the WCF service

Regarding hosting: By default, you can host your WCF services in a Windows service running on localhost You can also host in IIS

but that is for hosting web applications, not WCF services. You can host in a console application Regarding the question: Is ASP.NET MVC exposing WCF Services via HTTP? How to: Use WCF Services from ASP.NET MVC (well you answered that yourself) A: The only question I have is: what is the reason for hosting it in the ASP.NET MVC website instead of actually making a WCF service? Why not just make a WCF service and host it somewhere else (or in IIS) and
