What's new in Super Galaxy Squadron Soundtrack:

may be in the air for our NBA rookies, but the full-court style offense is highlighted in the third and final part of the new parts themed by the seasons. If the youth revolution of the Players Association is going to make changes in how they handle the new collective bargaining agreement, they might as well go all the way - new voting rules, player input into personnel decisions, and expanded benefits for rookies. Not surprisingly, some of these ideas are being discussed at the draft in Manhattan Thursday, June 25, where the world of sports takes a walk down the aisle -- well, jersey aisle - for a series of new reports from ESPN. The recruiting experience is different in the NBA than it is in college, but the same issues may come up for those who want to become a professional. ESPN identified about 50 issues that other high school athletes face to make the jump to college to the pros -- most of them youngsters who might have to take a toll on their families to get on the page. It's not necessarily a love marriage -- in some cases, it can be more like a business marriage. It's not hard to see why players get involved in these talks, with the possibilities for millions of dollars long a subject of public debate. Though, it hasn't always worked out, some said. For some, it's been the "ratio" -- of money to time with their families. Some of these issues haven't previously been discussed in any particular detail, including the collective bargaining agreement talks. It was a report that came out last month, in March, that mentioned another issue for NBA rookies -- to have a guaranteed second contract. Here's a look at what other issues are being talked about in the NBA. Early vote on draft: Player, coach and advisor vote, but the deadline for the players to sign their contracts is on July 7. No mechanical switch: Draft picks have second-year contracts, which is for multiple reasons. First, players who drafted early have first crack at a contract if they want to make the most money they can. Second, it allows teams time to do due diligence on the player's background - financial, academic, basketball commitment to the NBA. Land wind speed: Draft picks are coming in early because of the new Collective Bargaining Agreement, which will pay them $6.7 million for a rookie season. It was the input of the players that's allowed for that, and it's
